

ACKNOWLEDGMENT

The Symposium was conceived in April 1973. At that time I asked several students at Northwestern University School of Law to write articles for the Symposium, although I did not then know that the Symposium would be published in The Black Law Journal. Four students (Messrs. Bramlette, Bristow, Jackson, and Murray) each agreed to write an article as part of the Northwestern Senior Research Program, under my supervision. Under that program a senior law student works closely with one professor in producing a paper for which the student receives credit toward graduation. Mr. Smith's article was originally written for Professor Austin Flemming's Estate Planning Seminar. Mr. Smith graciously agreed to expand his paper into the one that appears here. Mr. Roland Person, a second year law student, diligently organized and wrote the Attorneys Around the Country section on short notice. Fortunately, Thom Edmonds, Dean of Admissions at Northwestern, agreed to write an article on accounting for the lawyer. I would like to thank each of the student authors and Dean Edmonds for his diligence and patience in working with me on this project. Moreover, I would like to thank Messrs. Barack, Goldman, and Kirby (each a Northwestern professor), and Messrs. Verkler, Roberts and Whitney (each of the Chicago firm of Jenner and Block) for reviewing the articles.

The Symposium was well under way in October 1973 when Ralph Smith (one of the founders of The Black Law Journal, presently a teaching assistant at the Harvard Law School, and soon to be Assistant Professor at the University of Pennsylvania Law School) suggested that the articles be published in The Black Law Journal. I am thankful to Ralph for that suggestion; indeed, this is the most appropriate medium for this Symposium. Ralph, Professor Henry McGee of the UCLA Law School, Marilyn Ainsworth, Executive Director of The Black Law Journal and the staff of The Black Law Journal have each been a tremendous help in bringing this project to fruition.

I would also like to thank Northwestern's Dean James Rahl, Professor Jack Heinz, and Associate Dean Edward Palmer for their administrative assistance with this project. The Symposium would not have been possible without the publication subsidy which Dean Rahl made available. Further, I would like to thank my research assistants, Almeta Cooper, Christopher Newman, and Theresa Cristler for their help on various aspects of the Symposium. Finally, a thanks must go to Mrs. Sandra Swickard for her secretarial assistance.
